As with most of Perry's workshops, his primary goal is to encourage participants to approach landscape painting with an experimental attitude and the idea that, 'It's only ten bucks worth of materials. Have some fun. Colour outside the lines!' That isn't to say that painting doesn't require some knowledge of the principles of design and some discipline to apply them. However, sometimes the anxiety of thinking we have to produce a 'finished product' often results in tight drawing, tight brushwork, and slavish attention to photo sources. Instead, let's aim to challenge ourselves to 'loosen up.' Along the way, we'll talk about composition, values, and colour as they apply to our paintings.

Perry will demonstrate his approach to working from photos, with full demos each morning, and mini demos throughout both days as participants work on their own paintings. He will be demonstrating using acrylics, but oil painters are welcome, although some of the processes aren't strictly transferable.

Participants are encouraged to bring several landscape photos as references. The majority of the time will be spent painting, so make sure you have enough photos, canvasses, and snacks! (Supply list will be posted on : www.fraservalleychapter.com/workshops).
